The Man With the Tick Tock Heart William I. Lengeman III

The Man With the Tick Tock Heart is a long short story of nearly novelette length.

A tick tock heart, the uninitiated might like to know, is a quaint and exceedingly curious device. It is a thing of fine workmanship, from a time when objects were made carefully and with the intention of being around for a while. Tick tock hearts were once all the rage, but there are not many left nowadays. Some say there is one in the basement of a museum in Austria, but no one seems to know for sure.

In circumference, the tick tock heart was as big as twenty large men, standing clumped tightly together, and it was taller than the tallest basketball player. When it was not in the man's chest, it sat on the ground, rattling and clanking and ratcheting and whirring and huffing and puffing and snorting and, all in all, making quite a racket.

The tick tock heart was a vast conflagration of archaic and quite sturdy looking metal parts. There were levers and gears and pistons here and switches and bolts and dials there. And of course there were wires and tubes and pipes going every which way and all akimbo, intertwining amongst themselves like a basket of snakes engaged in some appallingly indecent act.
