It should depend as you of the largest errors in writing history.

Austen wasn't discouraged though as well as in 1803 a writer purchased her book Leslie for £10 (the same of £350). They didn't do something with it. Therefore it was only if Feeling And Feeling appeared in 1811 (nearly two decades after she'd started publishing it) that she was ultimately a published writer. She didn't notice her very own achievement, dying in 1817 of cancer or tuberculosis, after which it her works were mostly overlooked.

In her decades Austen observed the publishing of the very first version of Emma however it was pulped with only 563 of 2000 offered after four decades. Marketing and Northanger Abbey, actually Prejudice And Delight, were remaindered within the 1820s and Austen went to get a decade out of printing. Victorian culture became fascinated by her exceptional, peaceful life by her books.
