When NYPD detectives Jack Whelan and Burton Carver are assigned to investigate a grisly Greenwich Village homicide, the first-on-scene offers dispatch an ominous warning: “Tell ‘em it’s a nightmare. A total freaking nightmare.” After sizing up the scene, the pair agree on one thing: the responding officer got it right. With the discovery of a second dismembered victim, the pair are caught up in an internal department power struggle, and blindsided by a newspaper reporter intent on sabotaging their investigation.

Kept out of the loop by the lieutenant running the task force and having run afoul of the brass, Whelan and Carver find a pair of allies in the crime scene unit and make it personal—enlisting outsiders and working the case from the shadows. When a key player disappears, Whelan and Carver have to decide which rules they can follow and which ones they’re willing to break in order to locate the missing woman, and bring down a killer who is, quite literally, butchering his victims alive.
